[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Berg,

On behalf of the members of the Fraternal Order of Police, I want to express my most sincere thanks to you for honoring our nation's law enforcement officers and other first responders by lending your voice to Verizon's Super Bowl LIII commercial, allowing for these inspiring stories to be shared.

The documentary series "The Team That Wouldn't Be Here" portrays 12 life-threatening situations—each time a first responder answered the call and rushed towards danger. These stories of individuals putting their lives on the line happen every day; all across the country.

Speaking about his near-death experience when a tornado hit Tuscaloosa, Alabama, long snapper for the Jacksonville Jaguars, Carson Tinker says, "Anyone who would put themselves in that kind of scenario to help others; I mean, God bless you. They are out there every day putting it on the line. They don't do it for the glory. That is a true American hero. 'Thank you' is nowhere near enough."

The last couple of years have been trying times for law enforcement officers. Your support for these American heroes who perform incredible acts of courage and heroism in an effort to make their communities safer goes along way. It means more than you know. These gestures of appreciation from the people we serve make it all worthwhile for the men and women who rush towards danger.

Again, on behalf of the more than 345,000 members of the Fraternal Order of Police – The Team That Will Always Be Here For You – thank you for your continued support.

Sincerely,

Chuck Canterbury
National President
